Software is an important product in any company, because software allows you to make things that you could not make otherwise. (David DeWitt) Software is a valuable resource; it's also a finite resource, and software pricing is something every company should be conscious of. The software market is complex, and many companies are not able to navigate the complexities of the market, and of their own pricing policies. I can help you to understand the software market, your competitor's pricing, and most importantly, how to price your own software in a way that reflects its value. Tiered pricing is a pricing model in which a software product is sold at different prices depending on its version or feature set. Here are the common tiers and the reasons behind them:

I just ran into an interesting issue while trying to get an ASP.NET application running on a Windows Server 2003 box to respond to requests on the Internet using a WebDAV share from a Windows 7 box. The server had IIS installed, but no ASP.NET was installed, nor did I attempt to install it. I was surprised when I tried to access the server remotely, and instead of the usual welcome screen, it gave me a message saying "IIS is not available". Odd. I know that Windows 2003 Server doesn't support ASP.NET, but I wondered if perhaps Windows 7 had a special ASP.NET implementation that took advantage of IIS 7. I don't have access to a Windows 7 box, but I have an XP box I could borrow. My hypothesis is that the reason why the server responded to requests from Windows 7 when I had that installed, but not from Windows 2003 when I had that installed, is that IIS 7 supports the "classic" ASP.NET model, whereas IIS 6.0 and below do not. Can anyone confirm that this is the case? What would be the implications of that? What would be the easiest way to get an ASP.NET app running on Windows 2003 Server? Thanks. A: No, Windows 7 has its own ASP.NET implementation. The reason IIS was not available is that IIS is running as a service on Windows 2003 servers by default. For this to work I think you have to install IIS on the 2003 server. I believe this would still run as a service on Windows 7, but then the web server needs to be configured correctly. Installing ASP.NET on Windows 2003 is out of the question in my opinion. / *
