Restoring a database from a read-only thumbdrive, memory stick, or other similar source is a tricky thing to do with db4o. db4o offers the ability to restore databases that it manages to any other database. This feature is called db4o backup/restore. Although db4o databases are not part of the software itself, it is possible to restore a db4o database to another db4o database. So this feature is of great importance, and it makes sense to learn how to handle a db4o backup/restore by using db4o Object Manager.

What's the Purpose of a db4o Backup/Restore? The usual purpose of a backup/restore is to back up a database to a different location. For instance, suppose you have two instances of db4o.

One of those instances is running in your PC, and the other is running on a server. You could now use db4o backup/restore to save the data that's stored on the database on the PC to a thumbdrive, on a memory stick, or on another server. This is very useful, as this way you don't lose any data if the hard drive of your computer crashed or if you're using a server. Using backup/restore is a very good idea to keep your databases safe and at the same time allowing you to move them around. db4o backup/restore is done by using the Move function. The db4o Object Manager features a very useful function that allows you to create a path to a file on the filesystem that is recognized as a file system that supports db4o

Article content continued “I’m getting a high-speed, never-before-seen view of the ball’s flight and it’s not pretty. I’m seeing all the things that needed to happen on Sept. 17, but not at the speed and scale of the disruption I witnessed today,” Green warned. Canada and Thailand are playing in a two-game series in Bangkok to decide which nation would play the United States for the final spot in the men's World Cup of Hockey. An 8-6 loss for Thailand on Tuesday took the series to a winner-take-all finale on Thursday. We apologize, but this video has failed to load. "The most disturbing aspect of the spike in temperatures," he said of the heavy cloud cover that buried the game early, "was the reduction in visibility. I had no vantage point on the game that told me the ball was striking multiple Thai players, none of whom were wearing face masks." Photo by Sean Kilpatrick / THE CANADIAN PRESS Green went on to discuss the impact of the carbon monoxide in the Canadian team's hotel. "I'm not blaming the World Cup committee. The environment in Asia has become colder. Hockey is a winter sport, but sports teams should be seeking alternative locations and playing early in the day when the carbon monoxide levels are low.” But if it’s hard for Canadians to cope with conditions for them and the Canadian Hockey Association it’s even harder to ask players overseas, especially those from Asia, to cope with extremes in the environment. ❖ b7e8fdf5c8

Q: Why don't we use a full-wisdom-roll to determine a's expertise? I feel that using a full-wisdom-roll makes much more sense than determining the listed proficiency, because in the rare event that a PC has a high enough proficiency, they will roll a d20 and gain expertise in another field. (Like the Barbarian who is a veteran fighter and has a high enough proficiency in combat to gain expertise in the same field.) Additionally, in the event that a PC has a low enough proficiency, the game could adjust that proficiency for them for the next roll, rather than use a defaulted proficiency for the entire game. This would mean that professions/skills would be a bit harder to stick to, however it would certainly increase the accuracy of the rolls. Is there a reason for not using the full-wisdom-roll in determining a's proficiency? A: Probably because, as you indicate, a high-end modifier for a proficiency could easily be bumped up. While it'd be nice if magic items and skills saw this level of overcompensation for low-end modifiers (and it'd free up those options to be used for something else), this is far less of a concern for low-end proficiency bonuses than with proficiency (generally meaning at least 4-6 to get anything useful). Not only is this complexity of the system not necessary

(just imagine what a game with 5 choices at the start would look like), but it'd be limiting to the character's advancement. If one were a wizard who had a high enough proficiency in Arcanum (say +4) and then got a major magic item which offered +6 to all of the arcane schools, they'd get that across all of their proficiency rolls with no spending of proficiency points, immediately making their proficiency roll what it'd been at level 1. Proficiency Bonus Either way, proficiency is a utility, and that's what it does—it generally provides a bonus to the
