TLDR version: if you want to avoid all the work you'll need to do to find "decent" foils, one idea is to check out the covers of the 3rd - 8th expansion packs for a big, obvious foil. Some foils exist in more than one expansion pack and most are a mixture. A recent discussion convinced me to check if this is an actual thing and if the idea of eschewing foiling for booster packs is feasible. The Memory Card Game is a Trading Card Game published by various companies over the years up until August 1998 (or earlier for some odd reason) and since then it is self-published by its own official publishers (the designer companies). The default strategy is a PBP deck-building game using a simplified, mythos-free mind-control/illusion-based setting of a world where people do stuff like sneeze, fish, play telephone games and have happy memories of their past lives as people who are not the same as they are now. People who didn't die in their past lives come back to "remember" where they want to go. Fair enough, but one of the best aspects of the game is that it manages to convey things like magic, myth, and even magic high society in an elegant and elegant game

way. In order to play, cards are shuffled into a deck with four different types of cards known as "reels" with "parts" on them. The first reel displays your "front", the second displays your "back", the third your "side", and the fourth your "greater side" (heh). Wizzy-wise you have a Current Status screen that show the three parts and a Hi/Lo/Full board screen. The cards in these reels put up a lot of stuff to the player except that the side can also be "visited in the future to affect events later". Each visit can only affect or affect the board in that area. The game propels you around a maze-like map where there are "electric monsters". To move there have been "keys", but they don't advance the game too much anymore. The key thing to understand is that you can make a single visit to a monster. Each visit has a number of "energy
