Free radicals are constantly produced in cells by metabolic and enzymatic processes as well as by exposure to exogenous agents such as ionizing radiation, toxic chemicals, drugs and their metabolic by-products. The resultant cell death, which can be either apoptotic or non-apoptotic, can be the consequence of either the death of the cell, or the death of the cell together with its underlying genetic material. Many cell types mount a cellular response to such damage through molecular pathways that promote the repair or replication of cellular components or elicit cell death. While the repair or replication response is clearly beneficial and has been implicated in maintaining genomic stability, it can have deleterious consequences in an organism, which is dependent on its germ cells and cell lines that are responsible for the transmission of genetic material. In this review, we will focus on the relationship between cell death and free radical damage and the role of some proteins, such as caspases and Ku70, in controlling cell survival and cell death.Also Available on: iTunes, Google Play, Vimeo, YouTube, TuneIn, Stitcher, Pocket Casts Monday July 9th, 2020 The panel is back and better than ever. Tandem mass spectrometry (MS/MS) is a powerful method for analyzing multiple proteins simultaneously. This study examined whether MS/MS could be used to diagnose breast cancer (BC) by comparing the serum levels of various biomarkers in patients with BC and those in healthy controls (HCs). MS/MS was used to detect four biomarkers, total cholesterol (TC), free cholesterol (FC), phospholipase A2 (PLA2), and acyl-CoA:lysophosphatidylcholine acyltransferase (ALCAT) in sera obtained from 40 patients with BC and 40 HCs. Serum samples were examined by gel electrophoresis and Western blot analysis. The amino acid sequences of PLA2 c9d1549cdd
