This question is similar to this one but now I want to understand the stuff in detail and not in the comments. In the first answer I linked to from that thread, the comments state: If the Mersenne prime you want is $2^t - 1$ (where t is a power of 2), then it can be generated by $2^t - 2^m - 1$, where m is a power of 2 (this is a special case of Euler's theorem). The number can be obtained with a right shift, so it's also an easily generated number. (But it's not a Mersenne prime, of course.) I don't understand this statement. 1$. Therefore,

Q: Scala function which takes multiple item 1 to I am trying to write a function which takes 2 lists. Each list is composed of domain objects. In this function, I need to pass one element from each list and reference that element inside the function. My first idea was to just pass an Array or a Seq to the function and wrap it in as an Array object. But it doesn't work because of scoping issues. Essentially what I want is to be able to pass 1 to N items as a function // function from Spark dataframe ... ((x1, x2, x3) (n, m, p))
