But its attribution to a particular discipline is unmistakable in such terms as "socio-anthropology" (Turner et al. 1988) and "socio-anthropological research" (Duffy 2003). (p. After all, the practice of sociography has been substantially anthropological, and that of ethnography in the sense of field studies has always been an outgrowth of the study of community organization. Dr. Sources: Rojmari Hudyma, Altair Hussin, Masood, Yassir.. as a joint chair for the Institute of Arab Sciences.London. The Atala Institute has done a commendable job in bringing this book to the public.C. However, as the author asserts in the preface, a book of this size would not have been possible without his having worked for many years on this project, which is also apparent in the book. There is much material, both textual and exegetical, that has come from his numerous visits to the Middle East. Specifically, he has traveled to Iran, Yemen, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Palestine, the Gulf States.0. Other archaeologists have also been inspired by anthropological thinking. Their work has been essentially that of an applied discipline. The prehistorian usually had the central issue in mind in his or her work: how do we know about the past. The issue is usually not the bare bones of the history. The historians and the anthropologists can agree on these, but the details are not of much interest. The more serious and valuable part is what is called the social, cultural, or human past. Thus. the archaeologist may not have the questions to answer in the same sense as the historian and anthropologist. Besides the question of what we know about the past, which is the human past, he or she also has to consider the questions that concerned the ancient peoples. For example, the question may be to discover more about their lives and culture and to differentiate them from other peoples or the modern. The archaeologist may be interested in the 6d1f23a050
