raising the dead is the ancient art of necromancy. a dark art that has remained in its own sphere for countless years. these recent master necromancers, the necromancers' guild, are attempting to remake the art of necromancy, which has remained as powerful as ever, but lacks the modernized form. however, it seems that time will not be on their side, as the necromancers, headed by the dark mage will, begin their assault. recover the lost talisman and strike at the heart of the necromancer threat. reclaim your land, and rule supreme. in 1868, jim wardin and his older brother jim, both settled near the small town of hod-ton, a two days' drive from buffalo and a day from rochester. jim became a successful lumberman and constructor, and the town benefited from his services. it is the year 1854. hodton is a small town on the side of the niagara river, midway between buffalo and rochester. the streets are dirty, and there is no law and order, but there is a job to be done. the logging of virgin timber has been halted by the state, but not everybody is content to wait for the clear-cutting. there are men, armed and dangerous men, who intend to do their own thing, when the state has not agreed to clear the land before selling it. james cross had been the senior partner in the soon-to-be-defunct apartment construction firm he and his brother john had founded, robert cross developments. ten years after the business collapsed due to the catastrophic price collapse of 1985, cross was still, as he put it, in limbo, a low-level dole debtor, his back-pay checks as dependable as the next meal in his stomach. he walked downstairs slowly, hands jammed in his pockets, his feet shuffling around the edge of the tile in a curious shuffling trot. there, he remembered, in the same place, at a different time, was the dinner they had had that night he was kidnapped. he and his wife were eating tournedos rossini. they had come home at ten p.m. and had gone out to the bar with their guests and, as it was christmas, the restaurant was very crowded. they tried to ignore the noise, to enjoy the scene of so many young people, the unruly excitement of it, the din of voices, the clatter of plates, and at one point, there was an avalanche of jingle bells, which cross remembered was a plumber rushing into the dining room to wish them a merry christmas. 5ec8ef588b
