Its not to massive, but the default is decent. The default aircraft is roughly 75% of a good scale airplane. This is still not bad, but it's not the best of either worlds. Scaling this aircraft to its full glory might not be the best idea, if you don't plan on using it as a scale airplane only. While the G1000 is my main focus, the C182-T will be there to too. However, some things I won't fly if ever given the opportunity are the G1000-equipped Carenado models, as I found the AI to be very sub-par in early releases. These problems are no longer with the newer and eventually finalised P2-DA42-G1000, but that isn't the topic of this post, more on the different differences when we get to it. Most X-Plane 11 and 12 aircraft only allow you to view these displays within the virtual cockpit. These displays can also be quite small and hard to read. However, if you have a home cockpit set up with multiple monitors, it would be ideal to see each of these displays shown full screen and without having to move the view around to see it clearly. Some aircraft support a pop-up CDU, but rarely any of the other displays. There are external apps that can provide some of these displays, but they reimplement everything from scratch and will never be an exact match for your aircraft. 5ec8ef588b
